Two days after the attacks that bereaved France, the former president's met the current head of state Francois Hollande on Sunday morning at the Elysee Palace for a meeting one-on-one with the former president Nicolas Sarkozy to discuss the possible actions to take after the Terrorist Paris attacks on Black Friday November 13. It is an uncanny but elegant meeting

Nicolas Sarkozy was received Sunday by the head of state Francois Hollande for a face-to-face about the deadly attacks in Paris Friday night.

Francois Hollande greets his predecessor at the Elysee, received by all parliamentary officials and party leaders. The two men then exchanged a handshake. On leaving a meeting of more than an hour, the former president Nicolas Sarkozy said he asked his successor to "drastic changes" in the security policy. "I told President Hollande it seemed that we had to build appropriate responses, which means a shift in our foreign policy decisions at European level and drastic changes in our security policy" as- he said. This is the second time since 2012 that François Hollande meets one-on-one with the former head of state, the first meeting that took place after the January attacks.

The interview with Nicolas Sarkozy Francois Hollande is the first in a long series of appointments throughout the day with the representatives of Parliament and party leaders.-----

This is the second time since 2012 that François Hollande meets one-on-one with the former head of state, the first meeting that took place after the January attacks. It is an unusual meeting but necessary to take actions against terrorism to reflect together a complete project a "state of war" following the tragic attacks in Paris of Friday, 13 November. The gesture is elegant from the two leaders of the current and former head of state, posting a national unity by a Republican approach that helps forgetting political differences in this time of national tragedy.-----
